This is an interesting take on putting profit above native species from the same program that refuses to grow native Olympia oysters on the Dungeness lease because there isn't a market for them.

This sounds like a great story. The introduction of the Pacific oyster to Puget Sound at the turn of the LAST century is a fascinating tale... truth stranger than fiction kind of thing. Folks think we are struggling with restoring Puget Sound now... but over 100 years ago it was pretty bad. We were decimating our local shellfish populations. For what? For profit. The expanding human population in Puget Sound literally harvested the Olympia oyster into oblivion. Pollution and sedimentation from development almost finished the job. We wiped out the region's wolf population. And we almost wiped out all the elk in western Washington. The salmon runs were so low we built some of the first hatcheries in the state... right here on the Quilcene and the Dungeness.

The message is pretty clear. The hand of man is heavy and we have proved this many different ways. This effort currently underway is not the first try at restoring Puget Sound... it is but the most recent try. We all know how much damage we can do to Puget Sound. We know what happens when we let the profit making aspect of our society run the show. It is embedded in our history. Many stories like the film "Ebb and Flow" include some history about how badly we treated our environment. We need to make stories about how well we did bringing Puget Sound back. Let's keep trying our best to fix what we have broken.

Scott

PS... that Yamashita name is pretty famous as most sportfishers know.
